

Mercadien Participates in American Heart Association's Go Red For Women

Staff from all levels at The Mercadien Group participated in the American Heart Association's Go Red for Women on Friday, February 4, 2011. February 4 was the association's national Wear Red Day; a day for millions of Americans to wear red to show their commitment to the fight against heart disease in women. New Jersey Each person wearing red is asked to make a $5 contribution to the American Heart Association which supports research and education programs. The Go

Red for Women movement has raised over $200 million to benefit women's cardiovascular health, according to the American Heart Association.

This is the sixth year that The Mercadien Group employees participated in and assisted in this campaign. Meghan Meyer, human resources manager, organized participation at Mercadien. "For years we have promoted a health and wellness culture within the firm. I think you would find that each of us within The Mercadien Group has been touched personally by heart disease, be that through ourselves or that of family or friends. As such, it reaffirms our commitment as individuals and as a firm to support the on-going education and prevention of heart disease."
